Strengthening European cohesion through art and culture Second Conference of the European Alliance of Academies, Madrid, 2/3 December 2021

Conference – Workshops – Projects

Círculo de Bellas Artes de Madrid, livestream broadcast

Far-right parties throughout Europe have discovered art and culture as a political war zone to further polarise society and assert national borders. The European Alliance of Academies is convinced that transnational artistic cooperation is one of the best ways of combating these tendencies.

The focus of the Second Conference of the European Alliance of Academies is to address the potential of artistic cooperation. The key question is: How can we better network in analogue and digital spaces and counteract political restrictions? To this end, the participants deal with different nationalistic approaches in cultural policy and their influence on cultural institutions and thus on the freedom of art in Europe.

Jeanine Meerapfel, President of the Akademie der Künste and initiator of the European Alliance of Academies: “If individual states in Europe withdraw into the national sphere with their cultural policy, we shall react by forging artistic, transnational alliances. We shall support each other and stand together in solidarity to protect freedom of opinion and artistic freedom. That is our contribution to shaping a democratic, social and just Europe. Together, we – the 65 academies of the arts and cultural institutions of Europe – are a powerful alliance.”

Juan Miguel Hernández León, President of the Círculo de Bellas Artes: “The current situation in Europe requires firm determination in many regards: politically, economically, socially and culturally. The world of culture plays a fundamental role in defending the values that define and unite us: solidarity, diversity, freedom of expression and artistic freedom. These are under threat in some countries on our continent. The European Alliance of Academies is an important instrument for developing measures to combat these threats and implementing them in practice.
